SUPPORTING FRIENDS WHO ARE SURVIVORS

Survivors of dating abuse and sexual violence usually seek support from their friends, loved ones, and community first, before reaching out to formal support systems like an advocate or counselor. Each of us can play an important role in believing, validating, and supporting those who are closest to us. Use the information and resources offered here to best support your friends if they are not feeling safe in a relationship and/or experienced violence.

REPORTING OPTIONS
Deciding to formally report an experience of violence, abuse and/or harassment is a deeply personal decision. Justice means different things to people and there are many reasons why a survivor may choose to report or not report, including personal safety. No one should feel pressured into the reporting process. You can support by sharing options and suggesting they connect with an advocate who can talk through the reporting options and process.

SAFETY CONSIDERATIONS
If a friend does not feel safe or needs an emergency option or medical care, you can find support options to share with them by visiting the FAQ section of the Survivor Advocacy Services web page at cwc.wwu.edu/survivorservices#faqs. Survivor Advocacy Services, offered through the Counseling and Wellness Center, is a confidential survivor-centered, trauma-informed resource for Western students.

DO’S OF SUPPORTING
• Start by believing
• Listen and communicate without judgment
• Know and refer friends to support resources
• Respect the survivor’s choices
• Encourage self-care and take care of yourself

VALIDATING STATEMENTS
• “I believe you.”
• “This is not your fault.”
• ”You are not alone.”
• ”I’m here for your support.”
• ”You are in control of what happens next.”
• ”I support what you choose to do.”

QUESTIONS TO ASK
• Is it okay to talk now?
• What is your biggest concern right now?
• How can I help? What do you need from your community?
• Can I tell you about support resources?
• Do you need an emergency option or medical care?
• Do you want to call a helpline and speak with an advocate?

24-HOUR RESOURCES
The reverse side of this handout lists support resources, including many available 24/7. These are also listed on the Survivor Advocacy Services web page at cwc.wwu.edu/survivorservices#24hour.

ACTIONS TO AVOID
• Asking for details about the experience of violence/abuse
• Minimizing or labeling the experience for them
• Having all the answers
• Making promises you can’t keep
• Pressuring them to make certain choices or making choices for them

TAKE CARE OF YOURSELF
Hearing about someone else’s trauma can be distressing or even triggering. Remember to take time to breathe, process your own emotions, and practice self-care. Grounding your own emotions will also help you maintain a more calming presence when supporting others. Respect your own health by only performing tasks that you are comfortable with.
